ABOUT CROP INSURANCE SCHEME:

India is in its villages and agriculture is sustaining the basic economy of the country apart from supplying food to the millions of the countrymen. Although agriculture in India has been depending on a variety of factors, natural and man-made as well, it has by and large keeping the promises of continuous supply, Andhra Pradesh having rich facilities with an excellent irrigation system established by Sir Arthur Cotton, is on the forefront in agricultural production, especially in coastal districts.

Of later, however, things have changed, even as the irrigated areas are on a constant expansion, factors like input costs, water and power supply, output levels, supporting prices and crop insurance selling prices have affected the system. These trends led to serious and unheard consequences. Under these circumstances a new and fair scheme has introduced by government of India namely National Agricultural Insurance Scheme (NAIS) in 1985, for protection of the rural heavy risk areas like flood floated areas, we are focusing the performance of the schemes in the rural economy to protect the rural farmers.
